Subject: Preventing radicalisation through education

In its communication of 28 April 2015 entitled 'The European Agenda on Security', the Commission states that action will need to be taken in a wide range of EU policy areas in order to meet security objectives. It proposes that this should include 're-prioritising the EU's policy frameworks and programmes for education, youth and culture'.

Action to promote shared European values, such as freedom and pluralism, social inclusion, mutual understanding and tolerance can play a key part in preventing radicalisation.

How will the EU encourage Member States to take specific action against radicalisation?
