

Question for written answer E-014569/2015
to the Commission
Rule 130
Stanislav Polčák (PPE)

Subject: EU migration as a result of climate change

The current wave of migration arising from armed conflicts and violent eruptions can only be a precursor to further streams of people who will head to Europe as a result of climate change. Specifically, this issue arises from a lack of water resources. According to certain predictions, subsequent waves will be far greater than the one currently causing alarm. Is the Commission aware of this problem? What preventive measures relating to it are in place?

I am particularly interested to know how efforts to resolve this problem are reflected in EU development policy.