Subject: Proclamation on people wishing to return home

I have drawn up a ten-point proclamation on the basis of the findings from a series of consultations with young people who have emigrated from Hungary, being compelled to do so primarily for economic reasons. The list of measures for which they are calling is constantly growing, but the fundamental points are already clear. It is extremely important that the Hungarian State should expand the Youth Guarantee Programme and that it should allocate extra resources to it, as well raising the age limit applicable to it. A European Union fund is needed to support young people – both those who wish to move back to their home country and those who wish to engage in business and remain there. Targeted programmes should support business start-ups, and there is a need for a tax system which helps people starting out in their careers, reductions in – or abolition of – taxes on internet use, and the creation of wifi points in places which are much frequented.

- Does the Commission have a similar action plan for supporting economic migrants?
- How could a comprehensive EU programme be planned and established on the basis of this and of similar political initiatives?
