Subject: Call for the monitoring of insurance company driver-analysis systems

The development of pay-as-you-drive insurance systems (entailing the installation of a 'black box' to charge drivers by spying on their speed, acceleration etc.) in Europe raises new issues.

By spying on drivers' behaviour to calculate their insurance premiums, this system not only violates their privacy but also places them under constant suspicion.

1. Mindful of its role as a guarantor of respect for fundamental rights and given Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, does the Commission intend to prevent such daily spying, which exerts psychological and financial pressure on motorists?
2. Does the Commission also intend to prevent the abuse of these personal data?
